*The Holy RosaryWhat is the Relationship between the Rosary and Daily Life?

“Our heart – John Paul II had affirmed in his first year of pontificate – can contain in these decades of the Rosary all facts which make up the life of the individual, of the family, of the nation, of the Church and of humanity”. It is precisely on the “anthropological implication” of the Rosary that the Pope dwells, by defining it as the “secret to open oneself up more easily to a deep and interactive knowledge of Christ through Mary”, but also a way to ask for help from Christ for “the many problems, worries, difficulties and projects which mark our lives”. The Rosary is also an answer to that “renewed need for mediation”, so typical of our times.

In What Sense is The Rosary a Prayer for Peace and for the Family?

Peace and the family: these are, for Pope John Paul II, two specific areas in which the prayer of the Rosary proves itself capable of “making us hope for a brighter future”. “The Rosary is a prayer oriented by its very nature towards peace”, writes John Paul II in the above mentioned apostolic letter of 2002, “and also by the fruits of charity it produces”, among which the “desire to welcome, defend and promote life, taking on the suffering of children all over the world”; to “bear witness to the beatitudes in every day life”; to “be the ‘Simons of Cyrene’ in every brother overcome by pain or crushed by desperation”. In short, to be “builders of peace in the world” and to “hope that, even today, such a difficult ‘battle’ as the one for peace can be won”. Another critical aspect of our times, for which John Paul II asks for an additional commitment, is that of the family. The re-launching of the Rosary in Christian families, in the broader pastoral framework of the family, can constitute, according to the Pope, and excellent occasion to:

- Nurture family prayer, so important even today;
- Entrust the itinerary of growth of the children to the prayer of the Rosary;
- Help parents to fill in the cultural generation gap;
- Rediscover the value of silence;
- Promote being together and communicating in prayer, among the different members of the family.
